

Rwanda's ibimina already work. Ganza does not replace the group, the meeting, or the money — it makes the record official, so that years of saving can finally count for something outside the room.

01 PROBLEM STATEMENT

The trust is already there. The record is what fails — and it dies with the group.

52%

of adults save through an ikimina or VSLA — around 4 million people.

3%

of loans asked for inside a group are refused. Trust, measured.

86%

of those loans are repaid in cash, so the repayment leaves no trace at all.

9–12

months, then the group shares out and closes. The notebook ends with it.

"Sometimes the person writing can make a mistake and record less."

Member — asked if she had ever worried about her money

"You have to call them, or look at what you wrote down yourself, or wait for the day we meet."

Member — asked how she checks the group's balance

"Kubika amakuru neza." —

Keeping the records properly.

Ikimina leader — asked for the hardest part of the job

02 PROPOSED SOLUTION

A logbook, not a wallet.

Ganza never holds a franc. The group keeps the bank, SACCO, Mobile Money or cash it already uses. There is nothing to hand over, so there is nothing to fear — a group can start at its next meeting.

We are not taking the power out of people's hands. We are giving them a way to use it that others can finally read.

STAYS EXACTLY AS IT IS

The meeting. The cash in hand. The treasurer, president and secretary. Who may borrow, and on what terms. The group decides — Ganza only writes it down.

WHAT GANZA ADDS

An entry at the moment money changes hands. An SMS receipt to the payer. A second leader who checks before it is final. A total nobody has to add up — and a history that survives the share-out.

One person writes it. Another checks it. The money never passes through us.

CASH FIRST, ON PURPOSE

The money still moves the way the group already moves it — hand to hand at the meeting. Changing that on day one would catch people off guard. Once the record is trusted, eKash and integrations with banks, SACCOs and mobile money can reconcile deposits automatically, at the group's own pace. Later, and deliberately.

Start where the trust already is. Earn the right to make it count.

We are not asking anyone to move their money. We are making the place they already trust easier to write down, easier to check — and finally worth something outside the room.
